Monthly comment

In March, global equity markets continued to show strong performance, reaching new all-time highs across several indexes. Though inflation remains persistent, there are expectations of interest rate cuts in both the US and Europe which supported markets, and the Partners Group Listed Investments SICAV - Listed Infrastructure Fund saw an increase in the month. The relative underperformance compared to the benchmark was mainly due to an overweight to communication infrastructure, which struggled in the face of ongoing rate uncertainty, and an underweight to energy pipelines. Apart from China, all regions had positive performance in the month.

In the pipeline sector, Williams stood out as a top performer in the month. Although there was not much individual news about the US pipeline operator, Williams' stock has been on a positive trajectory since its solid FY23 results were reported last month. Analysts have increased Williams's target price due to robust gas demand and the news of energy company EQT Corp's acquisition of Equitrans Midstream, which eliminated a deal-related uncertainty for Williams.

On the other hand, Equinix, a US data center operator, saw a decline in the month after an activist short seller, Hindenburg, announced a short position and alleged accounting manipulation. Despite this, the initial market response was relatively subdued, with some analysts dismissing the report. On the same day, the stock was even upgraded by Oppenheimer. Overall, we do not view these allegations as major concerns and maintain a positive outlook on the company.

Finally, Flughafen Zurich, the Swiss airport operator, announced strong FY23 results and offered positive projections for 2024, as well as raised their dividends by more than 50% compared to the previous year. The company anticipates that 2024 traffic will reach approximately 95% of the levels seen in 2019, surpassing prior market expectations. Moreover, Swiss regulators are considering implementing a roll-over mechanism, which would allow for adjustments to be made for return shortfalls or excess returns from previous years in subsequent years. This could potentially result in a retroactive boost for the company due to the underperformance during the pandemic.
